Facebook CEO Zuckerberg pressed before Congress today about the company's influence on elections, including a recent Russian campaign to get Donald Trump elected. "We are very interested in understanding exactly what the Russian use of our platform, especially with an eye towards the American elections in 2016, what role it played," the CEO explained. apologizing for being "personally not a big political person." He also made an odd argument about the platform's possible contribution to the election of Barack Obama, saying, "We did not try to influence the election in any way, shape or form." Zuckerberg also said that he's been talking with the intelligence community about how the company can protect against future attacks that try to influence elections. "What's happened this election is not new to us. We think we learned a lot from it. We're not going to stop doing this. We're going to make sure we do everything we can to prevent this from happening again," Zuckerberg said. This isn't the first time the company has been accused of restricting political speech. Last week, a computer science student at Harvard claimed he was blocked from creating a page for the school's conservative perspective. An article published on The Intercept reported that the project was suppressed, even after staff members appealed directly to Facebook's head of public policy Nick Clegg. It also appears that the company reacted in the same way when a group of Hungarian students wanted to create a page called "Stop Soros," a reference to billionaire George Soros, who has been a frequent target of anti-immigrant forces. Facebook did not respond to a request for comment.Q: Usage of Spring MVC Controller I'm creating a Spring MVC web application.
