The Apple Watch can be a lifesaver for women who suffer from a dangerous heart condition called atrial fibrillation. It detects dangerous arrhythmias and delivers real-time advice to help them keep their heart beating in a healthy rhythm. But until now, the Apple Watch wasn't an option for all. App developers will soon be able to add accessibility features to their apps, making them usable by people with hearing and vision impairments. The features will come as part of the new Apple Human Interface Guidelines for iOS and macOS, announced this week by Apple in a post to its developer website. The guidelines consist of best practices aimed at making apps accessible for the deaf, hard of hearing, visually impaired, multilingually or otherwise diverse user communities. They include guidelines for creating an accessible interface, adding captions, and designing content-specific icons. Accessibility for Apple Watch apps is coming in the second half of 2019,

Apple says. Apple's latest hardware, the iPhone 11, launched last month with the app HomeKit Secure Video. The feature is designed to give users, and particularly caregivers, additional safety in their homes by employing intelligent surveillance and location-based detection.
