Email, chat, Twitter, Skype, even in-car and in-flight entertainment, all demand more and more bandwidth from your router. You spend a lot of time connected, but how much time are you actually using the Internet? If you spend more than half your time on the Web, you are probably spending too much time online. Stop spending time online. If you spend a lot of time online, you're probably spending too much time online. If you're spending a lot of time online, you might need to cut back on time spent online. The Web is full of advice on how to get more time spent online. But how do you spend your time when you're online? Here are some apps, websites, and other tools for staying productive on the Web. 1. Inbox Zero The simplest solution is probably an inbox zero policy. Delete as much as you can from your email and Facebook accounts. Be ruthless and live with it. This will also work in your regular email. 2. Adblock Plus This is the best option if you don't want to remove the ads from websites, just the annoying ones. Adblock Plus lets you select which ads you want to block. 3. Readability Readability makes articles easy to read. Read everything you're interested in online and you'll see fewer ads and more clear text. Readability generates an even text size, makes text flow better, and adds emphasis on important parts of a page, so that you can read more. 4. Ditch Feedly Like Pocket and Instapaper, Feedly provides you with a single feed to access your entire RSS feed library, even if you subscribe to many different RSS feeds. And while the service is nice, it's much more useful when combined with Feedly's free Chrome extension, Feedly for Chrome. 5. Tweetdeck Tweetdeck lets you organize your social network posts in one neat timeline. It provides an easy way to access your Twitter feeds across all your devices, and can also be used as a standalone app. 6. Pocket Pocket makes it easy to save all your favorite articles online and read them later when you have time. The app also provides you with a single view of all the content you're interested in. 7. Evernote Evernote is a complete collaboration tool that integrates a free version with
