Q: Guitar: Best practice for cleaning a fingerboard after practicing or playing
Is it good practice to clean a fingerboard after practicing or playing? What methods are best for this? Also, how often should I do this? (example, after practicing twice a week, after 6 months, etc)

A: It is absolutely necessary to clean the strings and fretboard after practicing or playing. However, this is a tedious chore and it is better to clean with a few seconds of delay. The most important reason is that you will destroy the glue between the string and the fretboard if you wait too long. The best way is to dampen a cloth and then wipe the strings and the fretboard, concentrating on the strings. It is possible to use some mineral spirits but they are often way to aggressive and cause problems to the sound. Doing this frequently will damage the wood of the fretboard and you can lose a lot of tone.
