The pump drive motor is configured to reduce an output thereof according to the increase of the supply amount of hydraulic fluid pressure from the hydraulic cylinder. When the supply amount of hydraulic fluid pressure from the hydraulic cylinder increases, the output of the motorized pump is reduced. Thereby, the speed of the motorized pump is reduced. The hydraulic motor is configured to decrease the output thereof, and thereby to prevent the maximum hydraulic pressure from being secured in the hydraulic cylinder. On the other hand, in order to enhance the stability of the motorized pump, a feedback signal from the motorized pump is supplied to an engine control system. The engine control system varies an operating amount of the engine such as an intake amount, a fuel amount, and an ignition timing, according to the feedback signal from the motorized pump. As a result, the engine can be operated in a steady state. Although the stability of the engine is enhanced by feedback control of the motorized pump, it is not possible to control the motorized pump at an optimum speed, depending on a working state of the auxiliary system. Further, it is not possible to secure a maximum driving capacity of the motorized pump. A need thus exists for a hydraulic pump control apparatus which is not susceptible to the drawback mentioned above.Growth at the velocity of light and the central paradox of quantum gravity.
