Tue, 05 Sep 2018 11:13:43 +0000Steam Early Access The 2019 World Solar Challenge is on, and it looks to be shaping up a bit differently than last year's race. As drivers approach the finish line of the 2019 race, there's a new class of vehicles racing to the finish line. While some drivers will be racing with cargo in tow with their solar vehicles, others will be flying through the night with only their ingenuity, their two wheels, and the 2,600 km of dirt track in Australia's outback between them. While sun-powered, cargo-hauling solar cars have become a bit of a common occurrence in the last few years, the overhead cargo bin isn't new to the world of solar racing. The first solar vehicle to win a headline event was the Mansory Solar Car in 2006. Mansory Solar Car later won the World Solar Challenge in 2009 and 2010. Since winning the World Solar Challenge in 2010, Mansory has had no less than four vehicles enter the race each year, and continues to dominate the scene, with the most recent victory of 2017's World Solar Challenge. The Future Energy Vehicle (FEV) team (first and second place in 2018) is also no stranger to victory, having been the first team to enter the race in 2015. Originally named the Intersolar team, the future energy vehicle team has since rebranded with a new team name and powerhouse backing from the Riyadh Institute of Smart Solar Technology (RIST). Within the last 10 years, these greats of solar have dominated the headlines in the solar racing world, with the only significant change being the introduction of a technological platform for innovation that all teams are using. The 2017 Solar Team Abu Dhabi's Sunswift was the first to introduce modularity, which allows teams to modify the design and the ride of the vehicle mid-race, allowing for a more efficient vehicle. Given the discontinuation of the World Solar Challenge in 2021, this modularization of the race represents a great opportunity to sustain the brand, and turn the race back into a real event. The Solar Team Abu Dhabi and FEV teams are receiving incredible support from UAE-based firm Apo
