The major objective of this article is to evaluate the ability of polyaniline-coated capillaries for the microextraction of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs) from water. The basic principle of this work is based on the concept that the organic phase inside a capillary has a higher polarity than the aqueous phase. To overcome this problem, polyaniline has been considered to be an appropriate coating material for separation capillaries by adjusting the polymerization conditions. Polyaniline was then incorporated onto the capillary surface by electrochemical polymerization. The new polyaniline-coated capillaries were then analyzed by capillary electrophoresis. To demonstrate the potential of this extraction system for analysis of PAHs in water, the major step is to find out the most suitable procedure for extraction of the target analytes from the water samples using the capillary system. Several extraction and derivatization procedures were evaluated in order to select the most suitable one. Therefore, a new method for dispersive microextraction of PAHs from water was developed and applied to the analysis of the target compounds in environmental samples. The influence of the solvent, adsorption parameters, and pH were investigated in order to find out the best extraction and derivatization conditions. An optimized method was then applied for the extraction of PAHs from real water samples. 5 Things You

If it is, then it's time to correct it. I have heard that the word used is 'Filipino' for the Spanish name for the country of the Philippines. I would like to know if that is correct and also the history of the word 'Filipino' used for the people of the country. I like this very much. I would like to have the History of Philippines and the stories of the native people of the Philippines. Thank you for posting this very good stories.
