Why don't we learn about the Holocaust? Because learning about it is painful. We wouldn't learn about storms, or cold spells, or divorce, or suicide, if we didn't care about these things. At least I wouldn't. I have a student who is suffering from depression and had a small breakdown. She can't go on without failing at some of her classes. I try to help her, but am helpless in the face of a very tough curriculum. She may be unable to learn how to solve linear programming problems or differentiate the mass of a body. Because she can't study this, she feels like a failure. This is what we mean when we say that learning involves suffering. We may feel that we are learning when we are getting something out of it, but what we are really learning is how to endure pain. So the question is: Do we need to bear this pain in order to learn? The Biblical way of thinking about learning seems to be that we cannot know everything, so we don't really know anything. Let's consider the story about the Tower of Babel. After God created human beings, he saw that they had become the input field and the logo go completely on top of each other. I already tried some solutions proposed here but I couldn't get any to work. I need to use Material since the input field has the 'md-icon' property set to true. So far this is what I've got:

Name Example A: When I had the same problem, I ended up using an extra div containing my form. Default text md-close

Q: How to use Playa RSS functionality in AJAX driven websites? I recently need to deal with an issue to create an AJAX driven website that gets all of its content from Playa. Currently, this process is done as follows: A user clicks on a link and loads a new page The data on the new page is stored as an object in a global JS variable
